

As far as I'm concerned, violent and/or suggestive television programming can and should be regulated by the parents. We cannot legalize morality. If the programming is violent/suggestive - and if the proper labeling/disclaimer is shown/stated prior the show beginning - it would be up to the parents to decide if their children should watch. Most TVs today also have the "V" chip. Parents need to learn how to use it. To me, network programming should be no different then 'cable/satellite/paid programming insofar as content. Also, although a 'surprise', the Janet Jackson 'wardrobe malfunction' was blown entirely out of proportion. Let me ask a question: How do other countries - such as Japan and Great Britain - show rather explicit programming and they don't have any problems with it? Doe the U.S. over-regulate?
